Young officers of the 45th, who joined head to the Cape from England last December, neglected a desire to explore the neighbourhood of the quarters at Fort Napier, and went out on Monday morning for a ramble on the mountain side, had not gone a mile in advance when a dense fog and in ten minutes clothed every object within length in darkness impenetrable. The Johnny boys were first disposed to laugh at the suddenness, but soon grew serious at every step, "where measurably spread, seem lengthening" as they tried vain efforts to retrace their ground, to find a way, or even a lair indicating human association, tent or Kaffir, Ensign B. at last, over-fatigued, sunk exhausted into the bush. He fell, fortunately, from a nervous slumber by the evening bugle, at the extreme lines of the regiment, and making a resolute effort sprung to rushing on through fog and every obstacle until he got within hail of his quarters, but intelligence there of his brother officer, had strayed, it appears, much farther on, led thicket and briar, now immersed in wallowing to bushwood, and falling next into a gorge, invisible through the dense vapour. A ram for his life, and grasping the bank, lay helplessly powerless from exhaustion. Providence midnight the murky cloud moved off; wind, and the young officer imagined he saw a light in the distance. Fixing his eye upon the happy beacon, he satisfied himself of ignis fatuus and he eagerly hurried to object, at every stride, more lustrous, and reached a farm-house where he knocked for briefly telling his misadventure. The owner received him into a comfortable homestead, excellent dinner, roast turkey and beef, and a glass of brandy; providing him a capital bed and next morning equipped his own saddle and carry the young Officer to Fort Napier, accompanied him. When asked by Ensign Ward he would take for such timely aid and offer of friendship to a stranger, the man never; but his guest wished to know to so indebted—that he was an Irishman, was Hayes. He then rode back to his interior.

to have a trial in the Navy. Irish and will approve of the change, especially as it of late been so good as it was.
