

the Inspector General thought it withdrawn during the winter. It so happened that he was the meeting who moved to reduce the force. He hoped that they would not only pay in support of it, but that they would (hear, hear). He understood of the Lord Lieutenant to mean a reduction of fifty men, not had in the County at present, but had on paper. Therefore, if they had a resolution like that, they would be fifty men they had not at all and were in the county at present. It would be better to simplify the effect a saving of £1500 a year. He said—oh, I am quite certain we can get them. But, for the information he would tell them, that there was a resolution in force which, when enabled the Lord Lieutenant to send, and even to make the particular try pay for it. He would move one hundred men be made. Mr. Blennerhasset said his opinion was not to the protection which the county and life required protection, and to publish law and order; but he warned to deprive themselves of the protection. He read in a newspaper stealing the wool off the backs of sheep on in the county Clare to a point if they as magistrates did their duty the county tranquil, it would be to property, and to maintain law and they reduced this force they would be perfectly abortive. Mr. Veré seconded Mr. Maxwell's great respect for Mr. Blennerhasset, and thought his logic quite as good as for it was no reason because of the geese in the county Clare to pick the pockets of the rate payers (hear, hear, and laughter).
