

The Mayor then directed that the poor fellow who was evidently weak should be taken to the poorhouse and receive kind treatment and in the mean time the guardians would not fail to communicate with the proper authorities in England on this subject, which was one, they said, of great hardship.

Patrick Moore, a smith's helper, was charged with assaulting a publican, alarming his bar maid, and upsetting a barrel of cider, because he was refused a double supply of O.D.V. of which Boniface imagined that he had previously taken in an overstock and this offence being established by the evidence of Hebe Vulcan was sent to jail for 7 days' where, instead of blowing a bellows, he'll be engaged in breaking stones for the public roads.

CORONER'S INQUEST.—John Gleeson, Esq., city coroner, held an inquest yesterday in the board room of Barrington's Hospital on the remains of John Connors, a boatman from Glynn, who died from mortification and tetanus or lock-jaw combined, being the result of a beating and wounds which he received in Brunswick-street on the evening of the 18th inst., from Michael Maher, an Eamus carrier, and Martin Callanan, a corn porter of this city, who knocked him down, dislocating one of his thumbs and breaking the other, and of which gross outrage they were convicted at last Friday's petty sessions, and fined £2 each compensation or three months' imprisonment with hard labour. On Monday the victim of their ruffianism died, according to the evidence of Dr. Thomas Gelston, of a compound dislocation of the first joint of the right thumb, the setting in of mortification and tetanus, from the combined effects of which he died.

Dr. M'Mahon, the resident physician, said that it was with the greatest difficulty the deceased could be prevailed on to remain in the hospital, and that having received leave to go to the petty sessions on Friday to prosecute he did not again return until the next day. The learned doctor then explained the nature of the injuries received by the deceased, and the cause of death,—mortification and tetanus combined. Had the deceased remained in the hospital he might have recovered, that is, his recovery was not improbable, but it was also possible that he might die.

The other witnesses who were examined at the Petty-sessions, and also in the case when it originally came before the court, and whose evidence already appeared in the CHRONICLE, were again examined by the coroner, and gave similar testimony to that previously deposed to.

The jury returned the following verdict:—"That the deceased died of the combined effects of mortification and tetanus, which were superinduced by the beating he received from Michael Maher and Martin Callanan;"—and, on this finding, the Coroner issued his warrant of detention on the prisoners, who will now have to stand their trial for manslaughter.
