which the bandage is formed, yet has a tendency to weaken the power of the sinews in resisting the strain and tension put upon them when the animal is in violent action, as in galloping and leaping, or in fact in any of his movements, however gentle. Wherever artificial support is given to any part of the frame, though it may render it stronger during the time of its application, yet it renders it weaker when the support is taken away. Nature is a strict economist of material and power, and whenever art adds mechanically to the powers of any part, nature diminishes the powers it originally possessed, or more properly speaking, the materials upon which the natural powers depended.

In gymnastic establishments it is found that by bandaging the wrist or ankle and lower part of the leg, according to the limb to be used, the resisting power is considerably increased; but experience teaches that the continuous use of the bandage will weaken the parts to which it is applied to such an extent that they will be unable to resist, or exert as much force as they had been previously to the adoption of continuous artificial support. If after wearing a bandage for a long time the part is put to violent exercise without it, it will be found liable to be easily sprained, and otherwise injured, sometimes the softer tissues even ruptured.

Let it not be imagined that the use of bandages should be entirely discarded. When used with judgment they are admirable adjuncts to the training stable. It is their abuse that is deprecated; as they are generally used, they are, in reality, more injurious than useful. Continuous bandaging has a tendency to make a good hard, sound leg, what in stable language is called a witton, and there are many horses that will go faster in bandages than without them, they having an instinctive fear of exerting themselves to the fullest extent when they feel the artificial support to the leg, to which they have been accustomed, removed.

The effects of bandaging are not sufficiently understood by those who most frequently have recourse to it.

The performer of athletic feats, uses the bracing bandages when he is required to test his strength to the utmost. He knows by experience that they make him more powerful, and less liable to sprain, during the time he wears them; but he also knows that their continuous application enfeebles the natural powers of the parts to which they are applied to such an extent that eventually their use becomes an absolute necessity for the prevention of accident.

How different the general practice of bandaging horses, or rather its application to these principles.

The race and sheep-chase horses, and in many instances the hunter, give his preparatory exercises with his legs bandaged. The bandages are kept 5 even in the stable. They are not left off excepting for the grand struggle. The continual injudicious use of bandages renders the parts to which they are applied weaker instead of, as it is generally thought, stronger, and increases the frequency of injury to sinews or tendons, ligaments and joints. Thus it is that the injudicious application of bandages is frequently the predisposing cause of that which it is intended to prevent—namely, injury to the sinews, tendons, and ligaments, from the scarcely perceptible strain to the regular break-down.—Agricultural Review.
