court, which adjourned until Friday next.

CITY POLICE COURT.

The presiding justices this morning were—Captain Gavin (chairman); Alderman Mahony, Dr. Kane, and E. J. Collins, (R.M.) Esqrs.

Patrick Liston, a juvenile lately discharged from prison, where he had spent three months for "going to Cork to get change of a £3 note," the property of his employer, was brought up in custody of a watchman, and charged with throwing a stone into the establishment of a respectable grocer in William-st. The watchman also charged the accused with sticking him in the hip with a packing needle after he had him in custody. The youthful Arabian merely laughed at the fun of poking the watchman, and was sentenced to 28 days imprisonment, with hard labour.

Three women, who sell butter, were fined 1s. and costs each, for obstructing the flagway at the corner of William-street.

FROM OUR LONDON CORRESPONDENT.

A plain, straightforward Budget is a very satisfactory sort of thing in these days of speculation. A remission of something over a million of income tax, and the reduction of the sugar duties, are advantages which outweigh the disadvantage of an absence of brilliant originality in Mr. Gladstone's last statement. For all the favors which we receive at the hands of so arbitrary a functionary as a Chancellor of the Exchequer we are of course all extremely thankful; but, nevertheless, a great many individuals went down to the House last Thursday night who did not care very much whether the tax collector when he called next time would want a few pounds more or less, and who came away rather disappointed. As my readers have doubtless learnt by this time there was a dense crowd in the House on the Budget night. Party expectations were screwed up to a painful extent, and the famous leaders, Lord Palmerston and Lord John Russell, were attentive auditors beneath the same roof with the equally famous leaders of the Opposition, Lord Derby and Mr. Disraeli, and they were listening to a man who is less of a party man probably than any individual present—to an orator, and one of the deepest thinkers of the age. If the results were not astounding the sight was not to be easily erased from the tablets of the memory.

It happened to be in the gallery of the House of Commons on the evening when Mr. Bernal Osborne put his question on Danu German affairs to the Prime Minister. There was a full house, as there generally is when a ministerial statement is expected, and the only absentee of any note, as far as I could see, was Mr. Disraeli. I looked to the front Opposition bench, on which he generally sits, but the anxious face, check trowsers, and eye-glass were not there. Mr. Mr. Osborne has been termed the House of Commons buffoon, but he is in reality the wit of the assembly. No one who is at all familiar with his power of mimicry, his ready answer, or his fine commanding form would apply the former epithet to him. Members invariably and involuntarily smile when he rises, and dispose themselves to trifle more cosily on their benches, well satisfied, by their demeanour, that the tedium of ordinary business is to be relieved. On Friday night he was not quite so happy as usual, but succeeded in eliciting certain "cheers and laughter" in the course of his remarks. And then Lord Palmerston rose. Directly the well polished that was removed from the trimly arranged white hair the ministerialists cheered triumphantly. Turning towards his supporters and glancing at Mr. Osborne, who sat on the bench, the Premier began his reply. Unfortunately it cannot be denied—it was to be expected in the ordinary course of events—that the noble lord gets feeble and weak daily. As he sits, he looks extremely aged; but when standing his form presents a sad contrast to that tall commanding one we were so familiar with a year or two ago. In his speech, too, the noble lord evidently fails. He stammers, stops short, is at a loss for words, and sometimes even repeats whole sentences. It was with pain that I saw this the other evening, but with pleasure that I saw the House reverently—almost affectionately—applaud this fine old English gentleman. The expected cheer is never denied to him by his supporters, and his lordship only has to smile to put the House in good humour. As I came out of the House I was surprised to see a belated figure in a very long coat, and tremendous boots, issue out of the side entrance for members. In a moment after two other members came out and Lord Palmerston, putting an arm within each of his friends, trudged manfully home to Cambridge House. It was really wonderful to see this splendid old man set off at two in the morning for a walk home—disdaining cab or carriage—and chatting on the events of the hour.

and a-half miles from Limerick.

It is now being largely used by the Messrs. Fogerty, in Limerick, and has been approved of by the Overseer of the Board of Ordnance.

When properly mixed with Lime it is more like cement than mortar. Parties can either raise it themselves, or it will be delivered in Limerick. Price according to quantity required.
