

...ly, he conceived a grudge against him, he said, and after some time carried it into effect by shooting at the gentleman who was wounded, but eventually survived the attack. Cox, according to his story, managed to escape from the country, and reached Liverpool, where for a long time he worked as a quay labourer. Afterwards he returned to Ireland, and managed to support himself in the county Roscommon. The crime he had been guilty of, preyed on his mind wherever he went; and finally he decided on taking the course he on Tuesday adopted. The constable took the prisoner before Messrs. J. L. Cronin, P.M., and V. Fitzgibbon, on that evening, when he repeated the statement (as given above) he had made to the constable. The magistrates committed the prisoner until his story would be inquired into.
