Gazette says that the statement made vary in the early part of the week as session has met in one quarter with what an authoritative contradiction, and in an unauthoritative qualification. Nevertheless the statement in question is nothing more remote, and it may be looked upon Parliament will be summoned to meet on the 6th of November, the day to which the lands prorogued. Of course, the sole necessity of obtaining supplies for the session is unhappy, but, we fear, inevitable, expedition. This is the only business which will be occasion to enter upon before there is nothing in our internal affairs, negotiations with the great Powers, which require active action. Politically, we are in a predicament apparently likely to last till the formalities incidental to a regular session are gone through at the first meeting of The Queen's speech will be delivered, if the session indicated, and the business duly entered upon.
