THE GROCER OF THE PRESENT DAY is so important that the great changes which place in trade should not be lost sight of. There are none more worthy of attention connected with the business of the grocer than formerly it was customary for the grocer to trade in two or three articles, but his business now assumes the character of a store or depot for various large houses which have obtained a world-wide celebrity. Instances as may be found now in the grocer's list, viz., Huntley and Palmers, Crosse and Blackwell's Pickles, Colman's Mustard, Bass and Allsopp's Ales, W. and A. G. and Spirits, &c. One advantage of this change is that in place of having to depend upon the judgment of the local tradesman alone for the selection of his numerous varieties, the purchaser can now buy by various large firms, who by making up certain articles and sending out in sealed packages, furnish the consumer with a guarantee of value and quality. In addition to the recent addition of the wine and spirits to the grocer's business. It must unquestionably be an advantage for the public to be able to purchase wine and spirits through the medium of the grocer, of every variety and reliable quality, from the most known houses, such as Gilbey's, and at the most published prices. The medical profession especially welcome this change, as it enables them to use much more freely than hitherto the most wholesome (qualities so essentially medicinal purposes), while all classes can now obtain from their grocer either the most common or the rarest productions in each quantity, thus saving the trouble of sending to some distant part, which is often necessary.
