...continued to flow with a swift and steady current into the Corso from a small street (Via degli otto Cantone) that leads from the harbour of the Tiber, called Porta di Ripetta, past the Mausoleum of Augustus to the Corso, just above St. Carlo Church. So strong was the current at this point that an unfortunate mule, driven by a couple of men, had great difficulty in attempting it. To any one who saw this current and the body of water that swept along, it must have been obvious that a very serious inundation was imminent, yet no effort was made to remove the merchandise out of the shops. One reason of this, no doubt, was that in the Corso most of the shopkeepers live away from their shops, and bring no convenient place wherein to put their goods, they might have lost more in removing them than they would have saved. But the time was scapposed when the removal of goods was possible, one by one the steps of St. Carlo's Church disappeared beneath the flood; and by ten o'clock it was no longer possible to drive or ride through the Corso, and the boats began to appear.
