accompaniment of fried sliced potatoes, the an excellent dish for breakfast. The excellent too, curried; the beef devil the beef, it should be cooked in not grilled over the fire. In fact, there to the dishes which may be composed from meats, and they may be plainly warmed stewed in their own gravy, by putting the oven with a piece of buttered paper over prevent them from being dried up. This at all to be despised cold, just as they are moved from the tin, after the grease scraped off; but cold mutton is not favour, and, besides, there is too oft suspicion of the tin. If the meat is a piece, it may be successfully roasted, beef. Scrape away the grease and gravy, some of the solid fat in the center it up as well as you can, and round tightly with tape. Sprinkle with flour, and baste it with its own. It will not require much roasting, and soon became brown. Make some good use of the contents of the dripping-pan in the way, by pouring off the dripping from the tin. The grease, too, which was scraped off the first, when melted and allowed to cool, at the bottom of the basin a little good. The dripping will not be despised by poor hours as a substitute for butter. There is no doubt that in exactly the same proportion meats are better understood, they will be better appreciated."
