

The jury returned the following verdict.—
 "We find that Nathaniel Hone, aged 20, died at Dr Bourke's establishment, on the 1st instant, and that his death was occasioned by poisoning, carbolic acid having been accidentally administered to him instead of black-draught; and in our opinion in medical establishments poisonous drugs should be kept separately and under lock and key."

The deceased's remains were conveyed to the railway terminus for removal to Dublin by the afternoon express train, escorted by his relatives and friends in Limerick.

An inquest was held on yesterday morning at Barrington's Hospital by Mr Coroner DeCourcey with a jury on the body of an elderly man, a labourer, named James Halloran, who died there on Saturday night or Sunday morning from alleged injuries to the head. Head-constable Phelan represented the Crown. It would appear from his wife's evidence that deceased lived at the southern end of Clare-street, and on the 29th June last went out towards Newcastle to work. He returned that night in a state of drunkenness with two small or slight-looking cuts on the side of his head with blood flowing down over the side of his face. He went to Barrington's Hospital, where Dr Holmes dressed his wounds, and they were then considered of a nature not to require his being received into the hospital. He went off and on to the hospital as an extern to get his head dressed. But in the interim he took to drinking again; the unfortunate man was a habitual drinker. A short time ago he applied to be admitted into hospital owing to the state of his head; his request was granted, and getting worse he died. His statement to his wife on the night he returned home was that on the road he saw two men fighting, and while so engaged their horse and car went on. One of the combatants called out to him to stop the animal and the other told him not to do so. He went and stopped the horse, when the party who gave him the negative order went up to where he was standing, struck him with a large stick or stone and knocked him down. He got up and went on home. But while in hospital he would not give any account of what happened to him to the police or anyone else, and his story to his wife was believed to have been invented as an excuse for his drunkenness; and as the opinion of Dr Holmes was that the injuries were caused by a fall while the unfortunate deceased was almost helplessly drunk, and that the internal injuries—concussion of the brain—were intensified by his subsequent drinking, the jury returned a verdict that Halloran died from injuries to the head while in a state of intoxication, but how caused they were unable to state.

PRESIDENT GARFIELD'S WOUND.—that the bullet, after entering, took forward, and slightly downward until a rib. As it was originally stated the angle of entrance was between the eleventh rib, it must have been the which it came into collision. On striking it was deflected a little to the right but pursued a downward course. On introduction into the wound to a depth of between four inches, and pressing the end of it towards the surface, the end could be perceived about an inch beneath the skin in a direct line with this lower end of the wound, three inches below the opening made by the bullet, that there was made to reach the purulent deposit. Inference from this description is that the bullet never entered the abdomen at all, that it is still lodged among the muscles back in the lumbar region. The tenor of the symptoms which have followed the injury also confirm this view of the case. It seems not to be the slightest ground for suspecting the liver to have been injured by the wound. If it be true that the bullet, after striking the rib, was deflected among the spinal muscles, its lodgment there may give rise to comparatively serious inconvenience. The wound may in time heal over it, the bullet may become quiescent, and, unless excited into causing irritati

The strike of the agricultural labourer today extended to the city of Cork originated by a number of tradesmen's who arrived from the west of the county in a short time were joined by a number belonging to the city. The crowd then visited the principal works where labour employed, and tried to induce those to join them. In many instances they met with refusals, but in other cases successful, and the works at Anglesea-bay, deep water quay, and artizans' dwelling to be stopped. Fifteen shillings a week standard of wages demanded by the "for labourers. Some of those who joined receipt of 13s or 14s.
