An exciting expression, a catch-word grown stale-by frequent utterance, is sufficient to call forth the most brutal resolves. An incident illustrative of this will be found elsewhere in our columns. It seems that among the heterogeneous auditory of Archbishop CROKE, who a few Sundays since de-livered a stirring address from that historic prominence termed Sarsfield's Rock, were two men belonging to those opposing factions who too frequently have imbued their hands in internecine blood. A visit to the public-house on their return from a ceremony where it is to be hoped words were spoken which told of "peace and good-will," and then the raising of peace and good-will, and then the raising of a meaningless but infuriating war-cry, were alone sufficient to create a tunnut which lasted a considerable time, and in which at least one man received dreadful injuries.
