ING DISASTER IN NOVA SCOTIA.

117 MEN KILLED.

A terrible explosion occurred on Saturday at Hill Mine, Nova Scotia. The reports which reached Halifax, though somewhat meagre, state that the disaster is one of great magnitude, and is believed that the death-roll will not fall short of a hundred. The Springhill Mine is the most important in the Cumberland coalfield, and the largest in Canada. The explosion occurred on the east slope. Nearly a thousand men were at work in the pits at the time, and were employed in the immediate vicinity of the mine of the explosion. All these are among the dead, injured, and missing. Hundreds of miners escaped by the connection with other slopes, but it is feared that many men working in the part of the mine where the disaster occurred were killed, including the manager. Seventy-five bodies have been recovered, and twenty men have been taken to bank in a terribly injured condition. Men are clearing away the debris to get at the bodies beyond, but the work is one of great difficulty, and the rescuers themselves have had many thrilling escapes. The pit's mouth is crowded by women and children, and heart-rending scenes are witnessed as the bodies are taken up. Springhill Colliery is owned by American and Canadian capitalists, and has an output of over half a million tons. This is the first serious loss of life that has occurred in a coal mine, and probably the greatest calamity that has ever befallen the Canadian coal industry.

THE LONDON DOCK STRIKES AND ENGLISH COMMERCE.

It is not so much the foreign as the carrying trade of England which is jeopardized by these strikes, and it is on the carrying trade that our national prosperity very largely depends. We have away from Holland and fought many wars to maintain and extend it; the result being that nothing like a century we have been able to obtain great advantage, the porters of the world. It can be more certain than that we shall lose our trade if the Seamen's Union has its way. London will no longer be the great entrepot of the produce, whence the products of Africa, India, and Australia are distributed throughout Europe. It will inevitably become a mere call. And it will not take very long, in days of change and rapidity, to bring about his result. Antwerp has spent fabulous money upon her docks, and the Belgians will soon mean to untried to fill them with shipping. Hamburg is following her example. Hamburg, the second city in the German Empire, is rising in wealth and enterprise every year, France, Belgium, Holland, and Germany are earnestly alive to the magnificent opportunities which the policies of British nations are affording them. It is in the hands not merely of the ship-owners, but of the men themselves and of the community, that such disastrous attempts are to be resisted. When men talk glibly about the whole trade of the country, they are aiming themselves enemies of England, and enemies they must be treated. We have to restrain the natural competition of nations; but that is no reason why subjects should be permitted to play the game of our rivals, and for their own selfish ends to inflict injuries, severe and, it may be, permanent, upon one of the most important and valuable of our national industries. Those who are jealous of the trade, and those who would gladly step into her shoes to make merry; but among Englishmen there is only one resolve, that this state of things
