the spirit" of an old squire for 150 years in the Red Sea, that the time was expired, and that he had returned again. Matters had reached this crisis when a local roysterer, after his daily peregrination, and having dined not wisely but too well, so far forgot himself as to endeavour to reach his home by the dreaded path. The following is the account he gave of his experience that night: "I were a coom just to the churchyard, when from under the gert chestnut three thur coombed the most horrible site I ever seed.
Twur a tall figgur, and his face and haunds were a shining just like a box of damp matches, and patches on him seemed to be all o' a flame. It frightened I mainles; me hair was as stiff as brissels, and I should have bolted, only me legs wouldn't run. I wur sober enuff now, and he coomed towards I, and not a sound did hur make, and when hur weer coombed quite close, he spoke in a terrible tone the words, 'Show me to my grave!' At that I found me feet, and hands too, and I went for'n, and I found he was a main solid speerit; and didn't he holler for mörcey, to be su e!" The victor of this midnight encounter is now the hero of the district around, and he carries in his pocket a rubber tennis-shoe as a trophy of his victory. The ghost has been confined to his house with a severe attack of influenza.
