

THE LIMERICK CHRONICLE

ESTABLISHED 1766.

THURSDAY EVENING, SEPTEMBER 30, 1897.

A GREAT deal has been lately written about the prospects of the Irish farmer and the Irish peasant during the coming winter. There is not a doubt that the potato crop has in too many places turned out extremely unsatisfactory. It has not, on the whole, been a prosperous autumn, for the very wet month of August had a very adverse effect. In some parts of this county the oat crop was not worth reaping, but in other parts a very fair result has been obtained. The potatoes are in general very poor, with occasional exceptions. The supply of turf is also a most important factor in the comfort of persons dwelling in those districts which are practically dependent on that fuel alone. Turf could have been saved during the hot dry portion of the year, but the downpour of August has woefully limited the available product. It is probably a fair view to take of the position that the harvest has been below the average; that over a large area it has been very bad, and that during the coming winter the peasantry over a considerable area will find it difficult to procure the very slender supply of necessaries that is essential to their maintenance as civilised beings. Indeed, it is to be feared that the "irreducible minimum" may be reached in districts where distress is not confined to this year only, but where the normal condition of the peasantry is only just above living point. The winter will be a hard one, judging from the condition of the autumn. At the same time we do not think there are sufficient grounds for predicting serious disaster, and as for anticipating a "famine," that may be classed, we think, amongst the workings of a lively imagination. At the same time it is incumbent upon the authorities to be fully prepared for the worst. It has already been candidly admitted that this cry of "famine" is raised in a certain quarter in order "to get some money out of the Government," as other people did. But such cynical selfishness should not be permitted to prevent a thorough examination into the existing state of things by those to whom the government of the country is entrusted. It will not do to "pooch-pooch" the warnings of coming distress as the empty statements of politicians in want of something to talk about. Distress may be used as a stalking horse, and doubtless is, but it is not improbable that the huge fiction of a gigantic famine may have a substratum of fact beneath it. Under these circumstances, we are glad to learn the Chief Secretary is about to make a tour through the Western districts of Ireland, in order to see for himself the actual state of affairs and the prospects for the coming winter. Mr Balfour has already made himself acquainted with the country districts of Ireland, and has followed
