THE "PRACTICE OF VIRTUE."

Who make a "practice of virtue" often account in which they charge themselves very bad act they can remember, and credit themselves with every good one. The balance the two shows their standing at any par- in the account book of the Chinese anthus. Among the acts by which merit accumulated is the purchase of live birds that they may be restored to their native land. It is easier to stand on the brink of a ditch a fisherman lower his net, pay for it, and throw it back into the river than into the cases of needy men and and give them judicious help. the fish are done with, while this is not the case with human recipients of charity. A missionary was asked by a native man to cure a blind beggar. It was a case of fact, and an operation restored sight. The missionary was waited upon by the same man, and told that, as he had destroyed the eyes by which the blind man could get a that is, by begging—it was the duty of a missionary to make it up to him by taking of his employment as a gatekeeper.— the Journal.
