

AND THE FISCAL QUESTION.

an enthusiastic reception meeting at Sheffield on the fiscal question. He asked so suddenly into such proximity years had been filled with prophecies made by the State. Those reforms were not in time, but circumstances were not in the time in which we do not blame Mr. Cobden but rather looked forward to an era of hopes and aspirations had not described the dangers and were suffering, they had a better chance of knowing a cure. His was a disappointment, but he did know of a way to go to far for a cure, but a palliation which he was. Was it commonsense that the world should try to find we find nothing to offer? In reflection he asked them to that a tax on food was not a practical politics. Addressing questions to himself, he said it might be asked if he had the fiscal tradition of the last century he would reply was "Yes I do. This is a power of which it never itself—that of negotiating." It would be perfect, but it would be recently recommended it for
