claims often find it convenient not to be too active or keen sighted, and in some cases they no more dare denounce the offender than a Scillian peasant would lay an information against a member of the Mafia. Even when a conviction is obtained, only a nominal fine is often inflicted, and when it is substantial the offender can rely on popular sympathy. A fish poisoner once was convicted, and smartly fined, whereupon he stumped the country side as a victim, getting so much money that after satisfying the law he was drunk for the next fortnight on the balance. The result is that Irish rivers are ceasing to attract sportsmen, and that the money which they would spend goes to other countries.

THE PADDOCKS TO-DAY.

Sixty heifers and cows listed at this weekly market, the greater number being only middling
