"Must Salute Redmond" THE WILL OF IRELAND

AND THE IRISH VOLUNTEERS

IMPORTANT POINTS TO BE BORNE IN MIND

The Irish Volunteers, says the Dublin Leader, have to be provided with two governments, which we may roughly call internal and external. The internal government must deal with the army as such, it must have sanction for making promotions and all the other matters that concern the army as such. In the circumstances of Ireland the evolution of such a government will call for the best energies and the best sense of those who compose the army. But no army is autonomous except in a state of military despotism. In all normal countries carried on in some sort of constitutional manner the army owes its obedience as an army to the will of the people as constitutionally expressed. The Irish Volunteers—and it is well to keep this in mind—are still in their provisional state. Recent developments and recent attempts by the anti-Irish Irish Times, and other forces, to create dissension clearly show to all Nationalists of common sense that so far as what we have called the external government of the Volunteers is concerned, they must as loyal soldiers of Ireland salute the will of Ireland, and the personification of the national political will of Ireland is represented by John Redmond as leader of Nationalist opinion. Under Home Rule the Volunteers will be subject to the Irish Government in power as the English army is—or until what we may call the Curragh incident appeared was understood to be—subject to government as by the constitution established. Until we get Home Rule the effective and concrete expression of Irish National political will is the Home Rule Party and John Redmond as accepted leader of that Party, and as accepted leader of the Irish political movement is the man, and the only man, to receive the salute of the Irish Volunteers. That is the only workable arrangement. There are no different sections of Nationalists. There is one main Nationalist political public in the country and its political leader is John Redmond. Certainly there is a dwindling faction in Cork, though how that faction, in view of the refusal of its representatives to vote for the last third reading of the Home Rule Bill, can argue that it is Nationalist though in a state of faction we cannot see. No one would contend that an Irishman otherwise acceptable as a Volunteer who voted for, say, the ex-chairman of the Cork County Council, should be refused as a Volunteer recruit, but what every man of common sense will say is this: If a non-political clause in the Irish Volunteers constitution can be pushed to the extent that such a man, because he does not see politically eye to eye with the main body of Nationalist opinion of which John Redmond is the leader, is to be empowered to say that the Volunteers as a body must not give the salute to John Redmond, well then the "non-political" clause must be blotted out. The Volunteers must salute Redmond as the political leader of Ireland, and the supporter of an O'Brienite candidate for R.D.C. honours may come in or stay out. If an Englishman is an out-and-out Republican he can stay out of the army; if he joins he must salute the King.
