Of course that rested altogether with the Corporation, and that morning he had taken to the Mayor on the matter, and he was unpathetic. It was the most suitable place that could be found. He felt sure the Mayor would put the matter before the Corporation. When he put the question of the Memorial before the members of the regiment they received it with enthusiasm, and had subscribed £70 towards it up to the present. (Applause).

Mr Vansittart asked if the scheme embodied the building of a club, or taking a house and fitting it into a club.

Press Association, says that the scheme of the composition of the Irish Convention published yesterday is unrepresentative of Irish feeling. It should be added that Mr O'Brien's message was despatched before Mr Lloyd George's statement was made in the House of Commons yesterday, but was based on the Press Association's Belfast correspondent's forecast of the composition of the Convention, which was generally confirmed by the official statement.

DEATH OF THE SOLICITOR-GENERAL.

The death occurred last evening at a nursing home in Dublin of Mr James Chambers, K.C., Solicitor-General for Ireland, from an anthrax in the neck, from which blood poisoning developed with fatal result. The Solicitor-General was born in Keady, County Armagh, in 1833. His early education was conducted in the Royal Academical Institution, Belfast, from which he passed to the Queen's College, where he completed his studies with distinction. He was called to the Irish Bar in 1856, and became a King's Counsel in 1902, and a Bencher of the King's Inns three years later. In 1910 he was elected to represent South Belfast in Parliament, and he held the seat from that date down to the present time. On being called to the Bar he joined the North-East Circuit, and as a junior he soon acquired a lucrative practice. When called to the Inner Bar he took rank almost immediately with the present Lord Chief Justice and the Recorder of Dublin, who were the leaders at that period on the circuit. Within the last ten years he attained to a prominent position in Dublin practice. The Solicitor-General was most popular at the Bar and in private life. In politics he was a staunch Unionist. He appeared for the last time on circuit at the March Assizes of the present year in Belfast, and it was while he was engaged there that he received his appointment as Solicitor-General. His death will be deeply regretted by all, without distinction of creed or party, who had the pleasure of his acquaintance.
