SKI INDUSTRY IN NORWAY.

Though skiing (pronounced skee-ing) is one of the most popular sports in Norway, skis are not made in factories, but by carpenters who devote all their time to this labour, in summer laying up a supply for the coming winter. They make them in their homes, by hand, and sell them direct to individuals or to retail stores. Christiania supplies all Norway and also exports skis to Germany, France, Austria, and the United States. In the country districts skis are often made at home, but the best ones are bought from the Christiania carpenters.

The best skis are made of green ash, with oak next popular, while the cheap grades are made of fir and pine. For skiing poles, ash, oak, and bamboo are used, the latter being imported. The poles are made by the carpenters that make skis. Lately Germany has commenced to manufacture skis by machinery, and Norwegian exports to that country have slightly decreased.

PRIEST-HOLES.

For 150 years or so after the Reformation, says the Globe, Roman Catholic priests were relentlessly persecuted, and if discovered in the performance of the rites of his religion a priest was put to death. But in spite of this, there were during those times many priests in England who considered it their duty to brave death rather than cease to do what they considered their duty, as did the Protestants when they were persecuted. Unfortunately, religious toleration was unknown in those days, and the Protestant or Romanist weakest at the moment went to the wall. After the Reformation many priests were concealed in the huge country houses of the Catholic nobility and gentry; and their hiding places were unknown to all except the master and mistress of the house, and possibly to one or two old servants. As a rule, the priest did not stay for long in the priest-hole at any one place, but a certain Father Blackhall spent many years thus concealed in the house of the Viscountess Melgum, in Scotland.
