at being asked to present those trophies to the players who had given such a good account of themselves in the winning of the championships. He had taken a keen interest in the working of the clubs during the past few years and had attended some of their principal matches, including the 1939 championship final, and, judging by their display and the manly spirit in which they always played the game, he was proud to be a follower of the Kilmallock teams. He complimented the players and officials on the very business-like way in which they had always done their work, as well as on the fine sportsmanship and spirit of cleanliness and good-will on the field of play.

Continuing, Father O'Connor said he understood that the junior hurling county championship medals were yet to come, and he hoped that they would be highly appreciated and be a great incentive to the players for further successful effort.

Father O'Connor then made the presentation amid a scene of great enthusiasm.
