the Land Commission that is responsible, whereas the City Solicitor says it is private property, subject to a public right of way. Whatever it is, there is one thing, and it is that the pro. and con. views of members of the Council have given Corbally ample publicity. Should there be anything in Mr. Keyes' contention then the Minister of Lands might be approached, but we prefer that the Agricultural Minister would be put in possession of the facts from the standpoint of the loss in food production. Dr. Ryan cannot fail to view the position of the occupiers, not from the angle of the costs of repair, but in the broader sense of his National appeal in a vital emergency. It is not only essential that all the land possible should be in tillage, but that more livestock be raised, and in the latter connection the Corbally pasturages were making a contribution until laid waste by storm and tide. There is no reason why the subject should be dragged on ad infinitum.
