ever increasing thirst, the pubs looked so inviting, the placards showed that Guinness was good for me. The good nun had trusted me—I couldn't let her down. That evening I was the most dispirited man that ever boarded a bus. When my three white coins dropped into Mick Faton's wallet my heart and soul went with them. Honestly, I couldn't do otherwise. I could never again in this life, or the next meet that nun and admit that I had abused her generosity and faith.

A LOT TO BE DONE.

Mr. Meghen, continuing, said there was one point he would like to stress, and that was that there was an enormous amount of work to be done in a parish like Hospital by an organisation such as Muintir na Tire. As Father Hayes had said, Muintir na Tire, like other organisations, was not one that would only exist throughout the emergency, but, in fact, would be more active and industrious after the war, when there would be a chance of procuring materials to undertake work which could not be contemplated during the war.

Mr. Barry Walsh, in his address, commended the officials of the committee and the members of the 1944 Council on the manner in which they had got through a difficult year and despite many obstacles had brought off some remarkable successes. He expressed the hope that those present would show appreciation of the abilities of their Council of last year, and in the election of the Council for the coming year consider what had been done by them under difficult and harassing times.

One of the objects of Muintir na Tire, he said, was to preserve and develop places like Hospital in keeping with the motion of time, and in this connection every endeavour should be made by those already in the organisation to extend membership to adjoining parishes and districts. What had been done in Hospital during the past year could be done in every parish, and co-operation and harmony, not alone between people of a parish, but also between parishes, was what Muintir na Tire wanted.

When 'twas four o'clock in Kilmallock, And not a moment more in Bruree, For a very good sensible reason, Kilfinane said half past three.

There is a story told of a traveller who was passing through Limerick. While purchasing a couple of gallons of petrol in the city, where new time was observed, the Angelus bell rang. He said his prayers, sat into his car, and drove to Kilmallock—one hour's journey. No sooner had he arrived there than the Angelus tolled forth again. Strange he thought. He transacted his business in Kilmallock, and drove to Kilfinane. Believe it or not when he sped into Kilfinane half-an-hour later, the third Angelus was ringing.

"Well," he remarked some time later, "Limerick is the strangest county I know; they seem to spend all day ringing the Angelus there. Personally I heard it commencing in Limerick City, and an hour and a half later 'twas still ringing in Kilfinane."

On many a summer evening as I watched the distant outline of Kilfinane from my door, I felt convinced that about nowhere else did the sun weave a richer pattern of light and shade. Threads of gold, and green, and blue, and purple were continually caught up, blended and interwoven to form a design beyond imitation by any earthly craftsman. It was the tribute of the sun to the one bright spot that remained loyal to his immutable laws.

new time, or summer time, or insane time, or whatever you like to call it. It beats me how he got away with it. Of course new time was had enough during the summer, but the idea of holding on to it during winter beats Banagher. Summer time in winter! Did anyone ever hear the likes of it? It's a mad world, my masters.

When I am wriggling out from under the blankets in the morning, with every lying clock boldly asserting that it is 7.30, 'tis little consolation to know that 'tis really only six o'clock—for ninety minutes is the extent of our folly. There is one town in Limerick, and to its eternal credit it gave battle royal to this time-changing fad, so that in the County of the City of the Violated Treaty three different times were once observed—new time, old time and Kilfinane time. Behold that gallant little town, perched on a hill, its tapering spire of red sandstone straining heavenwards to look down on Ireland's fairest plain; behold it raised aloft betwixt Gaitee and Ballyhoura, the tragic town where of old the poor mangled head of brave Staker Wallace rotted on a stake because he refused allegiance to the Saxon usurper; behold Kilfinane where God's own time in its last retreat expired.

When the rest of the country for some inexplicable reason agreed to put on the clock half-an-hour to conform with Greenwich, Kilfinane was adamant in its refusal. Let Cork and Dublin and Limerick do what they liked, Kilfinane would hold on to the sun time, and it did.
