TIMES HAVE CHANGED.

Until very recent times the ordinary man had no voice in this work but all this has changed and each of us has the duty of doing our share. And if we wish to avoid grave injury to the community we must do a good deal of thinking. We select men to take on the work of governing us; here we must know what we want and how to get it. The days in which we order to relate it to the needs of our time and problems. We often hear opinions expressed by sincere and able men that our modern university graduates are disappointing in their contributions to our social life.

There is a very good foundation for these opinions and all the western world is realising this fact and unlike us are undertaking very drastic reforms in their educational systems—both university and lower. We in Ireland are alone in our complacency.
