RECEIVERS FOR SOUND IN WATER. Professor H. A. Wilson's account in the Physical Review of an acoustical research on anti-submarine devices, conducted at the Naval Experimental Station, New London, Connecticut, is confused to the theory and does not give information as to actual apparatus, says Engineering. These may be of a very simple kind, however. His receivers for sound in water were Brown tubes, consisting of a tube closed at one end, in T fashion, by a shallow circular metal box, or by a small rubber ball or rubber tubing, the other end of the tube leading to the ear of the observer. The resonance frequency of single receivers of this kind depends upon the elasticity and mass of the receiver, true or false, of the tube; one single receiver upon the size of the tube; one single receiver may be able to concentrate into the tube the energy coming from an area 650 times the cross-section of the tube. When two receivers are used, one for each ear, and directed in the same direction, the sound is focused at the end of a straight rod, the direction of the source can be found by turning the rod until the source seems to lie directly in front of the observer. The apparatus was developed by the General Electric Company and used during the war by the United States Navy. The correct position can always be found unless the two receivers are very close to one another, but the best distance apart is half the wave-length of the water for the resonance frequency of the receiver. When a receiver, each of cross-section a, are connected by their apices to a tube of cross-section n, and the lengths of the several tubes are such that all the sounds meet in phase, the sound may practically all be concentrated in one tube. The arrangement of several receivers in straight line was proposed by Max Mason and adopted by the Navy. On board ship several receivers are fixed in the hull, with their tubes parallel so that the receivers see all at the same distance from the ship.

Source: persons have been arrested by the Frankfurt police, among them several Communist leaders and heads of illegal armed organisations. The authorities refuse to state the reason of these arrests.
