In the church signs of mourning were to be seen on all sides. The or flio, which was placed on a catalalous fronting the high altar, bad appealing wreaths laid on it, with serolls conveying remembrances of affecblon from relativas, or of kindliness and sympathy desply felt for and generously extended to him who had so sadly and regrestably passed from them. The service and the procoodings throwghout were of a very touch ing nature in ans sascolations they sycked from each and every one of the congregation present. They occupied quite an hour and a half, after which the funeral proceeded to leave. All among the cortege, which set out on foot for Limerick, or travelled to the cometery in private cars, in coaches, or on motor conveyances, were filled with but one thought-to do whatever in them lay to show by their presence in what high regard the decessed gentleman had stood with them. The others. portegs extended for a mile, if not more, and when is arrived in Clara-street is was folded by numerous additions of obligers. These met the funeral at the borough boundary. and the procession then went by way of George's quay, Rutland street, Patrick-street, William street, and by Meigrave etrest to the camatery.
